VISIT TO CETEWAYO, UNDER GUARD AT CAPE TOWN.

A Brave Old Fellow Dauntless in Defeat-The Sable Monarch's Seven Wives. Climax of Kingly Gratitude-An Un-

Two years later I met Cetewayo, the Zulu chief, in the garden, under British protection. Knowing the colonial secre-tary, I obtained permission to visit his majesty at the residence assigned to him by government—a plain, scantily fur-nished farm house, fourteen miles from town, near a station called Wynberg. He was attired in Zulu full dress con-

He was attired in Zulu full dress, con-pisting of a necklace of lions' and chee-tahs' claws and a gorgeous leopard skin, worn skirt fashion, and as he rose to his full height to respond to my salute and receive my little donation he looked in say liberty, could not deprive him of— every inch a king, savage as of old, when in his days of undisputed sway, master of life and death over thousands, the royal "koom," the salute of a welcoming people, thundered in his ear, then a conqueror, now a prisoner.

I advised his majesty to present the queen and prince of Wales with a lot of ostrich feathers on his approaching visit espring of 1882 to England, but he trustfully. I asked for a room and was gave but a mournful smile, shook his head and pointed to his surroundings, a plainly of roast beef and was told there was nothand pointed to his surroundings, a pixiniy furnished room, a few wicker seats, a table and a colossal arm chair, the poor old fellow's throne, and mournfully exclaimed, "This is all I have." I felt sorry thad mentioned the subject, and with another hearty grip of the royal hand which I partially evaded I took my departure when the employes saw the contents of A few weeks later I called to bid him farewell, business demanding my return to Kimberly. I had brought with me as a parting gift, a dog—a handsome Newfoundlander—having learned that he had often expressed a wish for one. Cetewayo on this occasion were a navy blue suit of camel's hair. I had to endure the shake again, but suffered gladly for the sake of witnessing his delight to behold one who was not of a people he hated. Well, I thanked his majesty for the in-tended honor, told him that "my seraglio" was already overstocked; in my country four was the maximum a man of timony given by the venerable gentis-accepted as convincing and conclusive. However, I thanked him kindly. What the interpreter told him I never could ascertain; suffice it to say that the whole royal crowd abandoned their dignity and be is in ebted for the advice to which he owes his laughed till tears started, and three picks-nani relief from years of suffering, is Mr. King, for many years the popular night clerk of the Lawrence wanted to shake hands and the youngest merry septuple wanted to hug me. I evaded both by producing another lot of confectionery and calm was restored. But night was drawing nigh and I had to say goodby. I've often felt sad at partings, but seldom have I been more touched than at that time. Merciless, savage, cruel, relentless foe the English called him. I judge not. He may have cause to be so, but I had found him gentle and kind to those that wished him well and could see no sign of cruelty displayed towards his wives. Their last displayed towards his wives. Their last act was to present me with a lot of beadwork necklaces, anklets, etc., while the parting gift of the stern old warrior, who had lost his kingdom and had so little left to give—was the necklace of cheetah and lions' claws and the camel's hair cap from Zanzibar. I have both, and shall never next with the ciffs of my savage black part with the gifts of my savage black friends. Another shake of the hand, and I stood it bravely—all round the circle this time—and I mounted my horse and galloped towards Cape Town. Once I looked around and I saw them standing as I had left them—the black king shading his eyes against the setting sun, the dog fawning by his side; in the background, "the antelope eyed daughters of his people," who loved him and had followed him into exile. A mist came into my eyes and I saw them no more.—Cor. Philadel-es from M. Rochefort's Account of a Trip to London-He Had His Revenge.

M. Rochefort gives the Parisians a very pleasant account of how he was taken for a thief on his recent trip to London. "I had," he writes, "left Boulogne to pass a few hours in the bosom of that Albion so famous for her perfidy. I took no valise, not even a night shirt, as I intended to return the same evening. However the sea passage was so trying and the train reached Lendon so late that I couldn't think of making a second passage that night. I therefore went to Panton's ho-tel, in Panton street, where I stayed for-Somehow I felt sorry for the brave old fellow, who could meet defeat so daunt-lessly, and I must have shown it—for he and cuffs would produce on the people of the house. P. came, about 10 p. m., to take me to the house in his cab, the waiter, ashamed of the mistake he had made, hid his head in a saucepan. It was agreed that my friend and I should come back and have supper at 2 a. m., and the unhappy waiter came out of his saucepan to sketch for us the richest possible menu. 'That'll do,' said 'give us a good supper; but, you know, I absolutely insist on paying for it before-hand.' The waiter, humbled to the dust. pleaded extenuating circumstances, and said to the M. P.: 'I assure you, sir, we we took your friend for a murderer.
